Eisenhower Comes To Power At Time Of Great Crisis

By J. M. Roberts, Jr.

Associated Press News Analyst Washington (took the oath as President) he was faced with the problem of organizing a government where there was none, under a concept which was new to the world.

Abraham Lincoln faced a decision as to whether a vast group of free Americans should be forced, even at the cost of war, to remain within that government which had been formed such a relatively few years before.

Franklin D. Roosevelt's task was to compromise hysteria, fear and want which might have led the country into disastrous political experiments if not into revolution. He had to conduct a major war, too, but not one in which the U. S. was immediately threatened with destruction.

President Truman came in at the beginning—perhaps materialization is a better word than beginning—of a strange new type of war, an ideological and economic war conducted against a background of Russian military might which no free man could say would not be thrown into the balance at any moment.

This period of gestation, of realization, still continues as Dwight Eisenhower takes the oath as President. He doesn't have to organize a new government but is pledged to reorganize and revitalize the old one.

He does not face a civil war, but the whole world, of which the U. S. is not only an integral but a key part, is forced to contemplate the possibilities of what would be the most disastrous war in history.

He does not take office amid an economic depression but the possibility that one will develop occupies the minds of economic experts and must be one of his most serious considerations.

And this time the economic battle cannot be fought alone, as it was in the 1890s. Allies which the U. S. is pledged to defend face the same problems. Every preventive step, every effort to maintain the balance between guns and butter involves them, too.

Every estimate is that the next four years will be ones of as great crisis as ever faced the U. S. Russia is coming to the peak of her military preparedness. Her industrial plant, augmented by that of countries conquered by Communism since 1941, begins to approach war capacity. Her political regime is acquiring the age and consequent cracks which could cause her rulers to take desperate gambles in the hope of self-preservation.

Because he was their leader in war, because of his connection with the birth of the new post-war defence system, because he has now come to head the most powerful country on earth, the world will look to Eisenhower as it has seldom looked to one man before.

New York Stocks

NEW YORK, Jan. 25 — (AP) — Wall Street's wait-and-see attitude toward the new administration's economic policies kept stock market trading in low gear last week.

In contrast to the slight declines of the previous two weeks, prices managed to work higher on average, but the net advance was not impressive.

Volume contracted when the market tipped lower Wednesday and Friday, and expanded modestly during the hesitant rallies Tuesday and Thursday. Many in Wall Street read in this pattern signs of the market's basic buoyancy and a persistent lack of selling pressure by big stock holders.

Turnover amounted to 6,866,121 shares for the week as against the previous week's 7,723,145. The daily average last week was only 1,373,224 shares—lowest since the final week of October when the average was 1,195,946 shares.

On the week, the Associated Press average of 60 stocks advanced 20 cents and closed at $14. Many traders felt that the lack of market activity was a natural development, after the extended rise of recent months, while investors awaited more definite clarification of the Eisenhower administration's plans regarding such matters as taxes and controls.
