The Wall Flower

By Marion Robinson

Idling, Chapter 75. Pan's heart sank, though she wasn't entirely sure what George meant. She thought awhile, then answered. "I don't know what I'd do if Gloria married again. That would all depend—perhaps—on—wouldn't you like it?"

"That's the cry of the modern woman," George said cynically. "But most of them forget it after they marry. Why not? And he went into a discussion of marriage as a partnership to which the woman contributed other things than cash."

"I must confess I'm not keen on the independent woman," George ended. "She sacrifices a certain charm."

"Yes, independence suits her," George repeated. "It doesn't suit you. Your charm is your very lack of that."

"Come along," he called to Frankie, "we'll all take a cab and go sight-seeing. How about the Tower of London?"

"All right," Frankie acquiesced.

and eat with himself. In the next room. Pan went to the hotel phone and called for tea. Gloria laughed then and said. "Are you going to soothe me with hot drink and food? I am a cross patch today. Pan, as usual, you're an angel. I suppose I'm tired and I'm wretched too. Did George say he was coming around?"

But ice cream that came up to Pan's standard of what was good, was not to be had in all Lusk. So they tiled through several shops and salerooms for furniture made and remade plans for the house she was doing. The wire hand. Once she left town for two days rushed to a small town near Ely, where she purchased the carved oak paneling of a fine old Tudor mansion that some family had to sell to pay taxes. This she had crated and shipped.

Around Pan and Frankie wandered around London, Piccadilly Circus and the City with its law courts, and winding narrow streets, the Abbey and then St. Paul's—its huge dome rising in London, the art gallery, and the portrait gallery, with paintings of almost everything Pan had read about, the winding Thames and the quiet, trim looking squares with incriminated huge houses, in the smart quarters.

Pan adored sight seeing and would have been perfectly happy. But Gloria was jumpy and nervous to an extent she had never known before. Gloria was worrying over Santley.

Santley had not been heard from. "Mrs. Meighan is a frightful old gossip and quite unreliable, but she says Santley is engaged to this girl," Gloria confided. "Ordinarily I wouldn't believe her, but I mean I wouldn't believe anything she said, but she happens to know the girl's friends. That explains things—he was out of town for a while, but certainly his office forwarded my letter to write me about this affair, but either felt self-conscious, because of his old protests on my behalf, or else is waiting to see me and tell me personally, or else is waiting to see what my attitude is, now I'm free again."

"Anyway, we'll go to Paris day after tomorrow, if George will come then." This dependence on George was something new and inexplicable.

A REWARD

Chapter 76. In life even more than in fiction, people often work at cross purposes and make a muddle of days and weeks that might pass happily with mutual understanding.

So with George and Gloria. And so was Pan deceived. Gloria was in a curious mood Pan had never known her to react in any usual manner before. When the average woman is worried half to death she is irritable or depressed or on the edge of tears.

When Gloria was worried, she flew to an excited gait, false of course, but most deceptive. When she was tired and things were going wrong, she went from occasion to occasion in bursts of temper into an exaggerated patience.

I was never Frankie's naughtiness that annoyed her, his pranks and disobediences amused her. His little impudences made her laugh. She grew impatient now and then over a long period of angelic goodness on his part—over the days when he preferred a book and the catch to play, when he was good to the point of meekness.

"I want a tomy, that's my trouble," she apologized once when she told him sharply to be a real boy and go out and play with his friends.

But Gloria these days had the normal reaction of the most ordinary sort of woman to everything that happened.

"Frankie's in a run away locomotive, mother," accompanied by shrieks as piercing as only a small child can make them, brought a sharp:

"Stop that, Frank, or I'll send you to bed."

This rebuke so astonished the boy that he forgot his locomotive entirely and retired to play mouse.
