Milder Forms Of Polio

A FEW days ago, I was glancing over the figures showing the number of polio cases reported to the various health departments, year by year and month by month. A question that struck me at once was, why should so few cases be reported, when so many occur?

I believe that practically all health authorities are now agreed that polio is as common as measles; that, in fact, almost everybody, sooner or later, has at least a mild attack of this disease.

Fortunately, by far the great majority of cases are so mild that they can hardly be detected. The child afflicted has a degree of fever, perhaps a little pain in the back and a feeling of tightness. Now and then, there might be symptoms resembling a cold, for a day or two, or perhaps even some kind of bowel upset, but the symptoms disappear as rapidly as they come on.

Luckily, too, these mild attacks seem to immunize or protect the child against further attacks. Perhaps it is only the few children who escape these mild infections who succumb to a more severe one that may even produce paralysis.

Even when paralysis does occur, complete recovery may be looked for in the majority of the cases. Sometimes the paralysis is so mild that it is hardly discoverable, except by special tests of the nervous system and muscles.

Modern Methods Invaluable For the severe cases of polio with paralysis, and the bulbar cases that affect the breathing and swallowing, modern methods of treatment have done much to save the lives of most of those affected.

Hope for permanent protection against polio lies in the development of vaccines and, as most people know, studies to determine the efficacy of various types of vaccines are going on at the present time.

Mr. C.: I had a heart attack one year ago. Since that time I have lost my appetite. Could the heart attack be responsible.

Answer: Injury to the heart does in many cases produce nausea and loss of appetite.

Smooth Talking Salesman Cheats Toronto Housewives

TORONTO, (CP) - This is the story of three housewives in a Toronto residential district who were cheated out of $115 buying inferior suiting material from a smooth-talking door-to-door salesman.

Partial happy ending was provided by Mrs. Michael Humphries, Canadian Association of Consumers' ers textile experts who proved in court the material wasn't all the salesman claimed. The money was refunded and the salesman's licence suspended.

Mrs. Humphries who heads the research laboratory of a Toronto knitting firm has some tips for housewives confronted with "bargains" at the door.

TAKE YOUR TIME First don't rush into things. Salesmen of this type thrive on the quick sale, made and paid for before the woman has time to think.

In buying materials mixed with synthetic fibres such as orlon or dacron make sure the exact amount of the fibre is marked on a label or guarantee.

Door-to-door salesmanship is usually a "cat and mouse" game Mrs. Humphries said. "Think before you make a major purchase and don't be afraid to put the salesman off and consult the better business bureau on his status." In this case the salesman represented himself as newly arrived in Canada with most of his capital tied up in a "prestige" imported fabric from England, containing orlon and wool. He softened the housewife by telling her she must sell the fabric fast because his wife was having a baby and needed the money.

SHODDY MATERIAL Housewife No. 1 was a little dubious an hour after she bought the material and rushed it to her tailor. He said it wasn't worth making up into a suit—too flimsy. Later while driving in the city she saw the salesman polishing an expensive car in front of an imposing-looking house. She took the licence number and rushed into action.

She called Mrs. Humphries whom she had heard addressing her IODE chapter on textiles and asked her to analyze the material for orlon content. Then she went to the police who urged her to bring the case into court if the material didn't contain any orlon. Tests proved that the material was a mixture of cellulose acetate and modified cellulose acetate — no wool and no orlon.
