A DANGEROUS RIVAL.

'Henry, I should like to have a word with you this evening after the bank closes.'

This remark was addressed by Mr. Asa Meade, the junior member of the banking house of Ashburton and Meade, to Henry Levering the assistant teller, just as the work of the day was drawing to a close.

There was something in the air of the banker that made the teller decidedly uncomfortable.

Had he committed any blunder? Was there anything wrong in his cash? Had he failed to discharge his duties faithfully?

He could not recall anything of the kind. The first teller had never found any fault with him. He balanced his cash faithfully and found it all correct. It was only yesterday that Whitney, the cashier, who seldom indulged in complaints, had praised him for the faithful discharge of his duties, and predicted that he would one day be at the head of the house.

'What, then, can Mr. Meade have to talk about?' Henry asked himself.

But it was easier to ask the question than to answer it. His meditations were interrupted by Mr. Meade calling him into his private office as soon as the great doors of the bank swung to.

'I have always liked you ever since you were an errand boy in the bank,' began Mr. Meade, and 'I want to do you a favor.'

Henry was flattered, and tried to stammer out his thanks.

'I think you will trust me when I tell you that I desire to do you a very great favor,' said Mr. Meade.

'I certainly believe you when you say so, Mr. Meade.'

'Henry Levering, answer me this question truly: Are you not in love with Clara Ashburton?'

The question was so wholly unexpected, that Henry's face flushed and language failed him. At length he managed to say:

'While I hardly acknowledge your right, Mr. Mead, to question me in regard to this matter, I have no hesitation in telling you, my employer, and, I believe my friend also, that I do love Clara Ashburton.'

A hard look came into Mr. Meade's eyes, and he questioned further:

'And does Clara Ashburton love you in return?'

'She has never said so. We have never spoken on the subject, but I believe she does.'

'But do you know that you have no right to love her?'

'I was not aware, Mr. Meade, that there was any insuperable barrier.'

'But there is. You are poor. Her father is wealthy, and his wealth will be her's. You should remember the differences of position that exist between you.'

'I do remember them. We are both young. I shall never ask her to love or marry me until my fortune shall justify the step.'

'But you have no right to place Miss Ashburton's future on such a contingency. It was long since settled that she should marry another. In short, Mr. Levering, I may tell you in confidence that I am to marry Miss Ashburton. This has long been understood between her father and myself. I trust you will not attempt to mislead the young lady.'

Henry was stunned by this announcement. This was something that he had not anticipated.

Mr. Meade went on:

'I desire now that we should have a distinct understanding about Miss Ashburton and the future. It would be absurd for you to aspire to her hand, in the first place. You are mistaken when you fancy that she cares for you in the least. Her father would not consent to a union, even were she foolish enough to fancy you. Mr. Whitney is about to retire from the bank. His position is in my gift. I shall make you cashier. All that I ask in return is that you shall write Miss Ashburton a letter and tell her that you once fancied that you loved her, but that you have discovered your folly in time to avoid a more serious blunder.'

'But why should I make any such statement to Miss Ashburton? It would not be true, and it is not called for. If she desires to marry you, Mr. Meade, I shall not interfere by word or act.'

'Your appointment as cashier depends upon your compliance with my very reasonable request.'

'Then I fear, Mr. Meade, that I shall not be promoted.'

'I wish you to reflect well upon this subject. I give you a month in which to decide, and in the meantime I trust to your discretion in your intercourse with Miss Ashburton. It would, indeed, be wise if you did not see her at all. It would be well for you to bear in mind that I can unmake as well as make you. You may go.'

Henry Levering left the bank in a high state of excitement. He had learned what it was to have a rival for the hand of the woman he loved—something he had never dreamed of before. He realized, too, that his rival possessed almost unlimited power over him, and he rightfully interpreted his covert threat.

Mr. Meade made no misstatement when he said that it had long been arranged that he and Clara should marry. In regard to this arrangement Clara had never been consulted. She was a dutiful daughter, and her consent might be counted on. She did not even dream of the arrangements made for her future. If she had any feelings for Mr. Meade they were of repugnance. Certainly she never felt that she could regard him in the light of a lover, although he was young, wealthy, and of unexceptionable family, as well as her father's business partner.

That evening Henry Levering met Clara Ashburton and told her of the interview with Mr. Meade.

She was frightened and wept hysterically. Then she blushing declared that she could not marry Mr. Meade, and ended by telling Henry in answer to a passionate appeal, that she loved him.

On the same evening Mr. Meade told Mr. Ashburton of the interview. They had both suspected the truth, but the confirmation greatly disturbed them.

They agreed upon one point—that Clara should not marry Henry Levering, but that she should marry Mr. Meade.

Henry Levering fully understood human nature, and knew what he had to expect at the hands of the bankers—that if they made up their minds to force Clara to wed Mr. Meade, they would find the means to accomplish their determination.

He presented the matter to Clara, and convinced her that nothing but prompt action would prevent the consummation of the contemplated union.

To abbreviate a long story, they sought a minister in whom they could confide, and were married.

Then they proposed to let matters take their own course, and trust to the future.

Mr. Ashburton, of course, sought an early opportunity to apprise his daughter of his future intentions towards Mr. Meade. Clara listened dutifully, and then told her father that she did not and could not love Mr. Meade, and could not marry him.

'Tut, tut, girl! you are foolish. Mr. Meade is a gentleman worthy any woman's love. Don't let Henry Levering put any sentimental nonsense into your head; if anything has ever passed between you, let it be forgotten. I shall trust you, my daughter, to respect my wishes.'

Mr. Ashburton had a supreme faith in his daughter, and fully believing that it she even did love Henry Levering, she would ignore him in deference to his wishes.

The month passed, and Henry had not complied with Mr. Meade's request in regard to his letter to Clara, nor was he promoted to the cashiership. In answer to a direct question Henry told Mr. Meade that he had not only not written the letter, but that he would not.

There was a dangerous light in Mr. Meade's eyes as he said:

'You will regret your obstinacy, sir.'

A week later and the village was all in commotion. A forged draft on the Shoe and Leather Bank of London, with forged endorsements, had been cashed by the assistant teller, Henry Levering. There was a consultation of bank officials, and detectives were sent for. The next day Mr. Ashburton as the head of the firm, made an affidavit charging Henry Levering with forgery and conspiracy.

Poor Clara! Her heart was broken when her father told her what he had done.

'Oh, father, father, you have killed me! I know he is innocent,' was all she could say, and then she became unconscious, and it was weeks before she became rational.

Henry Levering, protesting his innocence, was brought to trial; and here the wonderful powers of the detective began to appear. Two witnesses were introduced for the prosecution, who unblushingly swore that they were professional swindlers, and that they had entered into a conspiracy with Levering to swindle the house of Ashburton & Meade, that while one of them forged the draft the other had forged the endorsements, and Levering cashed the draft, and the proceeds were divided between them. Protected from prosecution by muzzling Queen's evidence, they could make this confession with impunity.

Henry Levering could neither impeach the testimony of these knaves or prove his own innocence, and the jury, after five minutes' deliberation, returned a verdict of 'Guilty.'

'Oh! my husband, my husband! you have been falsely accused and falsely convicted,' cried an agonizing voice, as Clara pressed forward and threw her arms around the prisoner's neck.

Mr. Ashburton turned pale at his daughter's words.

Mr. Meade roughly seized the prostrate girl to drag her away. Henry Levering pushed him aside with:

'Stand back, sir. She is my wife. I feel that I am the victim of your threats. You have ruined the lives of two persons who never injured you.'

A sneer was Mr. Meade's answer.

The most hardened of the two conspirators saw it, and were moved. He arose, and asked permission to make a statement, and at the same moment his companion hastily left the court-room. The judge granted permission.

'I desire to say,' he began, 'that the testimony of myself and my comrade was false, and that the detective who worked up the case was a party to the rascality. The forgery and conspiracy were contrived by Asa Meade, and Henry Levering knew nothing of it. We were paid for our work. I now understand the whole affair. Henry Levering was a rival for the hand of this young lady, and his removal was necessary.'

Long before this explanation was concluded, Asa Meade sat cowering in a chair, and Mr. Ashburton was at the side of his children, who had been so suddenly rescued from the depths of despair.

The judge set aside the verdict of the jury, and Henry Levering walked forth a free man amidst the plaudits of those in court.

Asa Meade disappeared from Woodville that night before the officers of the law could seize him.

The firm of Ashburton and Meade has long been changed to Ashburton and Levering.
