Business Spotlight

By FORBES RHUDE (Canadian Press Business Editor) The country so far has scarcely felt the demands which will be put on it by defence programs. But it will by next spring. That would seem to be the view of the government in announcing curbs on installment buying. Some sections of business, particularly clothing, were inclined to say: "Why put on curbs when our sales are actually off." In fact, from the retail trade at large, when questioned by the government, came the query: "Is this necessary now?" Apparently the government does think it necessary now; that the brakes must be put on at once or we shall be rolling too fast in a few months. They put on the curbs in face of reports of severe jolting of sales in the United States following similar restrictions there. Informed circles in Ottawa, when questioned on this, seemed not at all alarmed by the American experience. They felt that shortly there is going to be full demand for just about everything that can or should be produced. General reaction in retail circles seems to be that there will be no over-all fall-off in business from the new rules, but that certain sections will feel the effects, particularly stores specializing in low down-payments and long-term credit. Incidentally, though some clothing stores are not happy about the curbs, others think clothing sales will be helped. They think money will be diverted from more expensive durable goods, such as cars, furniture, refrigerators, to soft goods; in other words, a reversal of the process in which much of the consumer's dollar was being diverted to things for his new home. The result of credit-tightening in the United States, which may give some idea of what will happen in Canada, is summed up by the Associated Press as follows: One main thing stands out - people have cut back their heavy buying because they haven't got the cash for higher down payments or because their incomes are too low to meet the new stepped-up monthly payment terms. However, the picture is far from uniform. Most heavily involved in sales declines are automobiles, home appliances, television sets and furniture.
