"This snow will give a slippery road" we said.

"Wheels do incline to spin, I notice. Yes, with winter conditions, life does become more complicated, doesn't it?" he grinned.

"We must get the banking done," James offered.

Grist was taken away, and returned. The banking was put in order. There was a spell of carpentry. James fashioned a creep and a low trough for a litter of piglets, close by the pen of their dam. They gathered about it inquisitively. And at the sound of any strange steps, scampered back, as might so many children, to the safety they knew. The younger farmer hung the new door in the straw-barn, and was quite pleased with the change it made. It would allow now for it could be permanent pens on the barn-floor to accommodate if need be, any overflow of animal from stables or sty, or as James said, "ewes in the lambing season".

Peter, after school and with some assistance from his mother made a sizable snowman in the yard of the house across the lane. We can see it from the window in the yards' lights, and still the eaves drip in the mid-nest. The snow is disappearing. There will be little left of Peter's sculpture by the morning.

"It's amazing, Ellen, how fast these fall days go!" James says lifting the latch on the door which leads up to the wide old bed.

Facial Treatment A Must Since Beginning Of Time

By PATRICIA McCORMACK, NEW YORK (UPI) — In the name of beauty, would you believe — a glove for the face?

In the cradle days of the nation, women wanting to put their best face forward were advised to don this "face glove" three nights a week. The makers promised the thing that looked like a pale Halloween mask would erase every kind of spot, impurity, roughness — leaving the skin clear, brilliant and beautiful.

That thing went the way of the buggy whip before the testifying to its rather new utilization.

Or may be it fell from use because husbands objected? The history of quests for a beautiful face includes other odd approaches — all making attempts at fixing the face by comparison.

Imagine, for example, using a mask of barley flour and butter to cure pimples. Or "grazing" wrinkles with bread dough in ancient Rome, to make a did that, according to a report from a maker of cosmetics.

Egyptians are credited with starting cosmetic art about 3,000 B.C. The recipe for foundation cream fit for a queen of the time:

"Mix white lead, chalk powder, perfume and honey." The most you can say for that: if it didn't draw compliments, at least it would draw flies and other insects hungry for sweets.

Food, for some reason, was an important part of many ancient beauty treatments. Wealthy matrons of Cleopatra's era plastered their faces with masques made of honey, barley flour and narcissus balm.

Cosmetics, according to the report, reached a bizarre stage in France, lasting from the Reign of Louis XIII to Louis XVI. Men and women depended on the beautifiers.

To prove their "blue blood," members of royalty painted veins of their temples bright blue. They whitened their skin with creams of vanilla, cacao and almond paste. More "food for the face."

Natural makeup, an "in" thing in contemporary America, at that time was worn only by prostitutes. Law required them to look as unlike royalty as possible.

A favorite facial treatment of the time: cleanse skin with perfume, then apply a lotion of talc, buttermilk and honey over the face, neck and shoulders. When this dries to a cement-like hardness, pat on powdered cornstarch.

This made it impossible to guess a woman's age. They all had what looked like stone faces.

"The Duke of Lauzun," the historians noted, "once was horrified to find that the gay young beauty he had wooed at an all-night party was a woman in her seventies."

ELLEN'S DIARY

Preparations Underway For Cold Days Ahead

"Make haste — put your work in order!" November's skies and winds now remind Island farmers. "Get on with it today while there is still time. Tomorrow may be too late."

"We must hurry" the farmers say.

"I thought one time the frost were getting would stop everything" a farmer from over the fields said this morning. "But today the plow will run again. That's good too" he smiled. "It's a satisfaction to get the plowing all straightened away."

"It doesn't seem natural to be plowing in the spring, does it?" we queried. "There's always plenty to do then without that" he said.

And eaves dripped. And the stream ran red, and in an increased flow because of the melting snowfall, eddying through the tanks in the lane bridge on its way past the mill to the River below.

"This thawing should fill the wells" James offered at breakfast.

"And the swamps" we nodded.

"Yes. The old folks used to say the winter wouldn't set in until the swamps were full. But we can't always go by that. I've seen it come when streams and all were fairly low."

May and June, the thought came, "would set the orchestrans to play in swampy places, by streamsides and brooks. There would be scent of the fresh-strud earth all about them, and a robin's heart-warming, thrill to blend in with the frogs' nostalgic tunes.

"We should get a grist off to the feed-mill" Mack, come by offered pouring milk to a saucer for the dark kitties.
