

LITTLE SISTER ACT
These two little ladies are ready to go into their little sister act in identical dresses designed with dog appliques on the skirts. Though the rocks are one piece they give the appearance of two. The full skirts, suspenders and artist's bow ties are in red, while the bodices, with their tiny puff sleeves, are in white with red polka dots.

ELLEN'S DIARY
A Dampish Wind Blows After Promise Of Sun

What did this day promise when we came to it: James to the south window easing a suspender to a shoulder, to look down on the mill nestling amid its trees and between sheltering slopes, there in the deep of the valley, and to us that which denotes the morning - sun?

We fancy James expects by some streak of magic to find there by the pond, his weather map of younger years. There, at a glance, he could determine the moods of the weather, and the direction of the winds. So carressing the wind's summer-touch was on that pond, touching it lightly, rippling it with gentle breezes; fashioning lovely murmurings on its crystal bosom; mulls and trees, sky and cloud. What wondrous things too we have glimpsed there: a winking of mother-duck and her brood, as happy as so many children serene in their mother's presence, at play; trout leaping, describing a perfect arc, as in a flash of silver they returned to the depths; a heron poised against a background of alders, awaiting the exact moment to pounce on its prey; a pointed ripple in the channel, denoting a muskrat there. "And what with a chuckle today, of the one we, first to the lane - bridge church, had startled there. "Pop he went - just like that!"

"And away he swam. . . And your heart?"

"It turned a somersault," we grinned.

He sobered. "But we do see the most sights, don't we, on this farm?" he said.

James at the window this morning sighed.

His backyard weather we're getting," he commented. "Why, I can recollect springs when by this we would be along well with our fencing." A sparrow withdrew to the eave's nook below the eastern window. It was a cool dampish wind that blew.

"No woady - this," we said.

"And who would say that after the lovely glimpses of spring we

MARY HAWORTH
Female Co-Worker Gives Man's Wife A Hard Time

Dear Mary Haworth: So a month ago my husband became interested in a girl co-worker who is having marital trouble. He turned to him for advice as he is attractive and sympathetic.

She is vivacious and flirtatious and in helping her he became a buddy of the girl and her husband. They pal around together and even have taken a few combined business and pleasure trips, partly financed by my husband's expense account.

Recently when he was out of town I telephoned the girl and asked her to see less of him. She said she would, but she asked as she liked, Upp. I then called her husband (wrongly, so doubt) and asked him to discourage his wife from seeing my husband as I felt it was an unwise relationship.

On my husband's return I told him about it, but I hadn't anticipated that the girl and her husband would give him a hard time, according to my phone calls. They said I accused her of an affair and called her a dirty name, which I didn't.

They also said I was seen in a bar, living up, what he was away, which he knows is untrue. But he can't believe the girl and he's been outrageous about the phone calls.

The last straw is that the other night, about 12:45 a.m., I went to the kitchen in pajamas for coffee. Looking out the window he was sitting on the street, he said. Putting on a robe, he went outside. He was going to give him a hard time. He was at the curb, talking to the girl in her car. We live in a dead-end street, only a block long. Obviously she had driven far out of her way just to live in his apartment. She works three nights a week.

I feel she is chasing him and I don't like it. But what can I do? He won't take a stand and I can't hear this uncertainty. I can't talk with him about it as he feels I am just a jealous woman, nothing I say makes any sense on him. Please advise me. R.D.

Dear R.D.: Your story, here, much condensed, gives strong evidence that slowly but surely you are gaining ground. In defeating the girl's campaign to entangle your husband.

I feel she is chasing him and I don't like it. But what can I do? He won't take a stand and I can't hear this uncertainty. I can't talk with him about it as he feels I am just a jealous woman, nothing I say makes any sense on him. Please advise me. R.D.
