A Romantic Story from Maine.

Some years before the war Otis Burton, a former resident of Bangor, left here to seek his fortune in the West. He drifted to Missouri, where he met an accomplished lady with whom he fell in love. She was pleased with him, but before he made his passion known she moved to a distant part of the South.

About this time the war broke out, and the two soon lost all traces of each other. Burton joined the Union army, and was soon afterwards wounded, and as it was supposed he would die, a letter was sent to his mother informing her that her son could not live. He, however, was blessed with a good constitution and recovered. He went back to his regiment, and was detailed with a company to take supplies across the plains. The party was attacked by Indians, and every man in the force except Burton killed. He was reported to have been slain with the rest. The Indians decided to let him live, and took him a prisoner to their retreat in the mountains of the south-west. He gradually recovered from wounds he had received in the encounter, made himself agreeable to his captors, and adapted himself to their ways of living.

After he had been in captivity six months or more, he was allowed more liberty, and now began to watch for a chance to escape. The Indians had stolen a number of ponies, and among these was one which Burton's practised eye showed him was highly bred, and with speed and endurance. This pony was cared for and petted by Burton, and he was allowed to ride him. One day he strayed away farther than usual, and, though not acquainted with the country, made a dash for liberty. He was closely pursued, but the gallant little pony had the "bottom" for a winning race. Burton rode for three days, and then began to see that he was getting out of the hostile country. In the distance he saw a house which he knew must be inhabited by whites. He shouted with joy, feeling that he had gained freedom at last. He knocked at the door of the house, and a surprise awaited him. It was opened by the woman he had loved in lang syne. He was at once recognized, and received a hearty welcome. Burton told his adventures and narrow escapes to a willing listener. She, too, told her story. She had married a Confederate officer, who was afterwards killed in battle, and she now owned the farm she occupied. Is it necessary to tell the rest? They were betrothed, there was a merry wedding, and the happy couple are still living in a south-western state. Surely in real life are romances as strange as, and more interesting than those weaved by the fertile brain of the novelist.

The General's Visitor.

When General Steele was commander of the post of Little Rock (the Arkansas Traveller says), he was visited, one day by an old fellow from the "Cove," a secluded district in the Ozark mountains. "I thought I'd come around," said the old fellow, "to tell you a piece o' news." "I am pleased at your consideration," said the general. "Is the news important?" "Well, I reckon it is; so much so that I've stayed here for three days trying to see you"; and he grinned at the military man. After a moment's silence the general turned to his visitor and said: "What is the information you desire to impart, old gentleman?" "Something you never would have thought about, general." "But tell me." "Oh, I will, for that's the reason I'm here. I only want to give you time to prepare for the revelation, as it were. I ain't much on military rules, and don't know much about sojers, havin' never seed but a few sojers, and one of them stole my chickens, an' I don't want to shove this thing too sudden." "Well, I'm waiting."

"Yes, glad to see it, too." "But you must tell me expeditiously, for my time is valuable." "That's the way I'm going to tell you, for I've wasted a long time already. There's none o' the punkin' enters 'bout me." "Look here, old man. You say you have important news. You can't know how important a piece of news can be to me. What you have to say may concern my army, in fact, the entire Union." "That's what it mount, general." "Then, sir, I want you to cut with the information." "I'll put you in the guard-house if you don't tell."

"I'm going to tell, for I come fur that very object. Promise me one thing, general." "What is it? Be quick." "Promise me that you won't hold me responsible for not telling you sooner." "I promise." "Make that soldier thar git out." The soldier was ordered to leave the room. "Now you won't say that I've neglected my duty?" "Certainly not. Proceed, please." "Don't you think you'd better have a man to make a record o' what I say?" "Never mind that. I can remember." "Wall, drawing his chair close to the general, "your name is Steele, aint it?" "Yes; go on." "That's good, an' that's what I loved." "But, confound it, what is the information you wanted to tell me?" "This, general, and his voice sank to a whisper: "My first wife was a Steele. Let's go out and get a drink."

A decrease is noted for 1889 in the number of immigrants arriving in Canada. In the United States the falling off in immigration is also strongly marked, the decrease last year from the figures of 1888 being nearly a hundred thousand. The change is due to the previous enormous outflow of emigration having relieved the labor market of the Old World and to the revived condition of trade in Europe. After a short time, no doubt, immigration will pour into this continent in its old volume, and we may expect that as the good land of the western states is now occupied, our own Northwest will obtain an unusual proportion of the inflowing host.
